LOS ANGELES – As the tenth annual outdoor theatrical production in the Barbara and Lawrence Fleischman Theater at the Getty Villa, the J. Paul Getty Museum presents the west coast premiere of Mojada: A Medea in Los Angeles, a new production by Pasadena-based The Theatre @ Boston Court, directed by co-artistic director Jessica Kubzansky.

A breathtaking reimagining of Euripides's Medea transported to East Los Angeles, the play is a new adaptation by Luis Alfaro, MacArthur Fellow and critically acclaimed author of Electricidad and Oedipus el Rey.

Euripides is said to have been born on the island of Salamis, west of Athens, around 484 B.C. and to have died around 406 B.C. in Macedonia. His Medea was produced for competition at the spring religious festival for Dionysos in Athens in 431 B.C. The play follows the sensational story of the legendary sorceress, Medea, granddaughter of the Sun and princess of Colchis, who deceived her family by aiding Jason’s theft of the Golden Fleece and then fled with him and their two sons into exile in Corinth.

The ancient play opens with the exiled family living unhappily in Corinth; neither Jason nor Medea can claim a land to call home, and Jason has decided the family will benefit from his marriage to the daughter of the king. In revenge, Medea deceives and manipulates everyone around her, using fearless audacity, magic and murder to secure her retribution.

In Mojada: A Medea in Los Angeles, Luis Alfaro tells an epic journey of border crossings, where his Medea, a seamstress with extraordinary skill, runs from a past of betrayals. With husband, Hason, and son in tow, Medea’s struggle to adapt takes a tragic turn when old and new worlds meet in the City of Angels. Alfaro’s gripping contemporary take on the ancient Greek myth tackles the complexities of family, tradition, culture, and the explosive moment when they all collide.

"Directing a new adaptation of this old, old story thrills me, as it resonates for Los Angeles today and echoes back to the ancient Greek, both in the extraordinary setting of the outdoor Getty Villa theatre, and in the fresh resonance that sings from Luis’s modern lens," said director Jessica Kubzansky. "The particular and prodigious gift of Luis Alfaro is that he takes a Greek play, places it in our town with people that we know, and from that specificity finds a way to universally show us ourselves. Luis’s adaptation makes me breathe and sweat and suffer anew with all the characters in this ancient story, and that new perspective feels both relevant and necessary. I am honored to have the opportunity to bring this extraordinary new adaptation to life."

"I am so happy to be making art in and for my hometown of Los Angeles," said adaptor Luis Alfaro. "Although the title of my play may seem incendiary, I am ultimately writing a love story of tragic repercussions that we have seen played out in history over and over again. Maybe this is why we keep going back to the Greeks – to learn how to be better people. I hope this L.A. story allows us to see the struggle in each other and unites us as one city towards making a better citizenry for all."

The Getty Villa’s annual outdoor theater production is part of an innovative year-round theater program that enhances the visitor’s experience of the ancient world. Live performances of classical drama offer insight into the social, cultural, and political realities of life in ancient Greece and Rome. In the galleries, the works of art serve to deepen the connection between modern audiences and the mythical stories underlying the tragedies and comedies on stage.

"Theater was a fundamental part of religious and social life in the ancient world, and as the Villa’s theater program – now in its tenth year – shows, Classical drama still resonates powerfully with contemporary playwrights, actors, and audiences," says Jeffrey Spier, senior curator of antiquities at the J. Paul Getty Museum at the Getty Villa. "We are thrilled with Louis Alfaro’s powerful, provocative, and modern adaptation of the Euripides classic, Medea, and look forward to having it come to life at the Villa this fall. I am confident that our audience will find it gripping."
